feast has come to be a part of the existing order of things like the Fourth of July and Christmas. And each year it is better than the last, if such a thing were possible. No more cordial hospitality is met with anywhere than at Casselton, and no finer melons grow than those that ripen on the judge's ferille acres along the banks of New river.

More than a hundred of Judge Cassell's friends assembled at his bidding Thursday evening. Each was disguised and masked, and much merriment ensued in solving the identity of the guests from their voice and conversation, aided by labes pinned on their backs, suggesting their leading characteristic.

After the masks were laid aside delight. The lawn at Casselton comprises about three acres, dotted with trees, flowers and shrubs. This was lit up with Japanese lanterns and electric lights put in for the cocasion, and a negro band under the trees sang and played coon songs all during the evening.

The melons were served on the lawn, Mr. Ned Cassel carving, assisted by Mr. My Casse
